Nineteenth Century U.S. Newspapers

Newspapers were the lifeblood of the new republic, and the contents of their pages helped shape the nation's identity, carrying not just the stories that unified American opinions, norms, and interests, but that also fuelled the crucial debates of the day. A board of five journalism historians carefully considered more than 1,000 newspapers, using their knowledge of papers and their respective eras to select papers that give a much more detailed insight into the nation.
